Overall experiences and progress of children and young people: good

Children enjoy positive experiences and make progress. They are happy and relaxed and are confident in their home. They have positive relationships with staff, who provide care, attention and time without hesitation. Spontaneous laughter from children and staff can be heard in the home, creating a warm and joyful atmosphere.

Staff support children to take part in activities that reflect their interests, age and development, such as a young child enjoying a theme park and a teenager being taken for spa days. Memory books record these experiences in a child-friendly way.

Children are supported to maintain strong family connections, including those who live far away. Staff support family time, including overnight stays, and keep families informed about children's daily lives through effective communication.

Children's moves into and from the home are well planned. Children receive guides and video tours before moving in, and memory books celebrate their time living in the home. These steps help children understand changes and create positive beginnings and endings.

Children's health needs are understood, monitored and responded to. Despite one child's specialist assessments being delayed, the managers support staff to provide care that is guided by the home's commissioned psychotherapist and that meets any potential diagnosed needs.

Staff have high aspirations for children. They work closely with other professionals to meet their educational needs. They advocate strongly for children's education, ensuring suitable school placements. For one child, this has led to a successful return to school with a clear plan for full-time attendance.

How well children and young people are helped and protected: good

Staff build positive relationships with children based on the home's ethos of nurturing care. When children display challenging behaviour, staff use skills from training to understand what the child is communicating and respond calmly.

The manager has a strong understanding of the risks for each child, including those linked to past experiences and individual needs. They respond promptly and effectively when risks arise. For example, concerns about one child's vulnerability online and potential exploitation were identified and addressed quickly to ensure immediate safety and provide learning opportunities. However, following the incident, expectations for staff were not consistently reflected in written plans, which reduced clarity about required actions.

There has been one incident of a child going missing from home, which began at school. The actions taken were appropriate, and safeguarding practice was evidenced by the liaison with the school to support the safe location of the child and their safety on return. This incident and one medication error were not notified to Ofsted as significant incidents. The manager was receptive to discussions on meeting regulatory requirements.

Physical intervention has been used with one of the four children. Overall, the 31 physical interventions used were deemed proportionate and necessary. Staff actions following physical intervention support positive relationships and ensure that the child does not feel shame or blame. The manager is aware that the timeliness and consistency of oversight of physical intervention incidents need improvement. Additionally, the quality of recording is not consistent. In one case, poor recording made it unclear whether an unapproved hold had been used.

The responsible individual and manager address practice concerns promptly, with advice from relevant professionals. When there are concerns about staff suitability or practice, action is taken swiftly with appropriate referrals to ensure safe employment.

The effectiveness of leaders and managers: good

The managers are ambitious for children and want them to achieve their full potential. They understand and respond to individual differences and needs.

Monitoring systems ensure that staff receive induction, training and development opportunities. Staff feel well supported and give overwhelmingly positive feedback, valuing team meetings, supervision and informal support in the home. Records do not yet consistently capture reflective practice or specific targets and actions, but this is acknowledged.

Professional partners report a collaborative and inclusive approach, using support and, when needed, escalation effectively. Care is delivered in line with the statement of purpose and agreed aims and objectives.

Managers note the impact of change and reflect on how this is supported and the lessons learned. They understand the need to continue actions that promote team stability and aspire to develop a collaborative learning and development culture.

An experienced, responsible individual supports the manager. Both share the ambition that understanding children's individual needs and gathering their views are central to the home's development. They model expectations for staff and ensure that children are engaged naturally and formally in decisions.
